Dammers “Reappointed” by Governor’s Office, Officials Surprised

Dr. Paul Dammers has been “reappointed” to the Psychology Board, after having resigned in September last year, according to a press release from the Office of the Governor. Dr. Dammers resigned September 4th amid controversy concerning Act 251 and medical psychologists’ dual positions in psychology and medicine.

According to the press release dated March 18th, “Dammers was nominated for reappointment by the Louisiana Psychological Association, as required by statute.”

However, results of the duly conducted election in November produced a list of names that were then submitted to the Governor for his selection. Dr. Dammers’ was not on that list. The results of the election, conducted jointly by LPA and LSBEP, resulted in six individuals being ranked as follows: Dr. John Simoneaux, Dr. Lee Matthews, Dr. Rita Culross, Dr. Tony Young, Dr. Gary Jones, and Dr. Glen Ahava.

Experts in Diversity Provide Insights

Editor’s note: The Times interviewed Dr. Marva Lewis from Tulane, Dr. John Robinson, now at Howard University, School of Medicine, and Dr. Linda Brannon, from McNeese, and asked for their ideas about the diversity within the psychological community.

“People perceive diversity and approach it as a problem,” said Dr. Marva Lewis, Associate Professor at Tulane, School of Social Work, and professor of Sociocultural Psychology.

“When I think of the benefits of diversity, I work with families, individuals, and communities with a whole different approach,” she said. “I’m passionate about what diversity can create.” Her website hosts this theme, named Diversity Creates.com.

The first thing Dr. Lewis does in her work is to take people through a process where they reclaim

LPA Meeting, Convention, Elections, April 22-24 May Be Pivotal

LPA’s convention (April 22-24 in Baton Rouge) will include elections and business decisions that could be pivotal for the association. Elections and a bylaws vote to enhance democratic process, is scheduled for Thursday.

A complete list of events and position statements by (four) candidates is included in this issue. See pages 5, 13, and Special Section, 15-19.

LAMP Leader Reviews Act 251 in National Psychologist

Writing for the National Psychologist, Dr. Jim Quillin provided a review of Act 251. He included a response to criticisms in his article titled “Louisiana RxP psychologist defends regulatory change,” for the publication’s March/April issue.

In the article, Dr. Quillin described
Letter to the Editor

In his article in the National Psychologist, Dr. Quillin once again misdirects the debate. In the past, he and his colleagues have called fellow psychologists “malcontents, whiners, and disappointed children,” and now we have “primitive religious fears.”

Well, let’s set the record straight. I and many of my colleagues opposed Act 251 not because of the RxP issue. Psychologists have long been involved in the bio-psycho-social aspects of health care, and we feel that RxP is a natural extension of professional activity for those psychologists who have been interested in neuropharmacology, and were willing to undergo the rigorous training involved in competent and ethical practice.

As an independent profession, Psychology has been growing rapidly. To illustrate the esteem with which outsiders view the science of Psychology, consider Dr. Paul Kaufmann’s data showing that the use of neuropsychologists and psychologists in the courtroom has expanded exponentially over the last ten years, whereas the use of medical specialties in the courtroom has expanded approximately with the mere growth of lawsuits.

One reason many psychologists in practice today enjoy healthy and independent practices is that senior members of our profession fought long and hard to get us out from under Medicine’s control. We have independent licensing laws all over the country that allow us to control our own destinies, without MD’s calling the shots for our professional activities. I have in fact championed RxP as a valid and perfectly natural part of the evolution of Psychology for properly trained Psychologists.

Part of the problem is that Dr. Quillin and his cohorts knew that there would be considerable opposition to this bill, and therefore went underground in order to make it happen. Dr. Quillin was Legislative Chair of the Louisiana Psychological Association (LPA) at the time when he was orchestrating the bill through the Louisiana legislature. His job for LPA was to discuss any bill coming before the legislature that would have an effect on Psychology. When his own statements about his allegiance to LA Medical Psychology (LAMP) and the passage of Act 251 came out, and that he resolved his conflict in favor of LAMP, he resigned his position with LPA.

It might be useful for Dr. Quillin to label his fellow professionals in such a pejorative way, but the truth is that he reveals himself as one who will try almost any expedient to get his way.

Mike Chafetz, Ph.D., ABPP
Reappointment...

Dr. Dammers’ reappointment appears to have come as a surprise to the executive directors of both LPA and LSBEP.

LPA Executive Director, Ms. Gail Lowe, told the Times that she received notice on Friday, March 19th by email and was surprised by the announcement. She said, “Dr. Dammers’ name was not on the list we sent to the governor’s office. The press release must be an error,” she said, “because LPA did not nominate Dr. Dammers for reappointment.”

Responding to questions from the Times, LSBEP Executive Director, Ms. Jamie Monic, noted that, “Dr. Dammers presented his resignation to the LSBEP on September 4, 2009 and agreed to serve until his seat was filled. That resignation, along with Dr. Ally’s, was faxed from this office to the Governor’s Office of Boards and Commissions on September 14, 2009. Beyond these types of communications, the LSBEP does not have any say or influence regarding board appointments or their authority to hold or continue to hold a seat. This is all handled by the Office of Boards and Commissions.”

She continued, “I was able to confirm with Dr. Dammers, upon his return from vacation yesterday [March 29th], that he did rescind his resignation directly with the Office of Boards and Commissions, but our office does not have details regarding that communication.”

Dr. Dammers’ reappointment falls in the midst of controversy about the passage of Act 251 by the Louisiana Academy of Medical Psychologists (LAMP) and the Louisiana State Medical Board. At the time Act 251 was passed, without involvement of APA or LPA, the composition of the LSBEP was homogeneous, all MPs or MPs in training. This led some to question the objectivity of the board. Additionally, MPs no longer have to be licensed by the psychology board, and this caused questions about the appropriateness of those same people to sit on the psychology board.

The election in November produced a diverse group of psychologists, and the expectation in some for a more balanced, heterogeneous board once all appointments had been made for 2010. With Dr. Dammers’ reappointment, the board will continue to have a majority with the MP designation.

It is unclear whether a resignation can be rescinded. According to RS 37:2353, “All appointments shall be from a list provided by the Louisiana Psychological Association.” Additionally, the statute indicates that, “A board member shall not be eligible to succeed himself.” There is no mention in the law about rescinding resignations.

Louisiana is Neurotic, Researchers Find

Researchers Peter Rentfrow, Samuel Gosling, and Jeff Potter, reporting in Perspectives on Psychological Science, (Vol 3, No 5), used the Five Factor Model to study the personality characteristics in states and regions across the U.S.

Louisiana ranked 8th in neuroticism. So, we might want to move to Utah. It’s 4th in agreeableness, 4th in conscientiousness, and 51st in neuroticism.

MPs Must Retain State Psychology License for Board Certification

In a “Policy Notice for States with Secondary Specialty Licenses,” published in their February newsletter, the board of directors of the Academy of Medical Psychology told it’s members that maintaining a license to practice psychology from their state was required for board certification in medical psychology.

The notice read, “In an era where some states may have factions of psychologists who seek a unique specialist license after they are trained as a psychologist, we remind them that maintaining their psychology license is essential to being considered qualified in the Medical Psychology Specialty.”

The announcement also noted, “Because of recent developments in which some psychologists may be considering giving up their psychology license, please remember that being licensed to practice psychology in your state and continuing to maintain that license is a requisite for maintaining specialty board certification in Medical Psychology.”

The notice said that an eLetter went out to all board certified medical psychologists about this policy on February 1st.

components of Act 251 and wrote that it establishes “a new practice of psychology which combines the clinical practice of psychology with medical practice, …” He noted that the transfer of medical psychology from the LSBEP to the LSBME was “in recognition of the implicit medical component of the practice of medical psychology.”

He answered critics, writing that, “The integration of medical procedures into the practice of psychology instead represents a natural evolution of our profession, and fears that doing so will ‘corrupt our values’ may be best viewed as akin to the kind of primitive religious fears sometimes exhibited when faced with the prospects of interfaith marriages.’”

Dr. Quillin’s review was in response to an earlier article in NP by Senior Editor J. Bradshaw, referencing The Psychology Times and editor Julie Nelson. Bradshaw’s article, titled “Louisiana RxP psychologists now regulated by Medical Board,” appeared in the Jan/Feb edition of NP and noted concerns of some Louisiana psychologists about the “secrecy surrounding” passage of Act 251 and the dual regulation of psychology created by Act 251.

Nelson had emailed NP in October ’09 asking if NP intended to cover Act 251 and explained that Louisiana now had dual regulation for psychology. In the January article, Bradshaw indicated that Dr. Jim Quillin had agreed to explain “what has transpired and why” in a future article.

At the time of passage of Act 251, Dr. Quillin was LPA Legislative Chair and APA delegate. He has since resigned. He now serves on the Medical Advisory Committee under the LSBME, as provided for by Act 251.

Dr. Quillin was a key figure in achieving RxP for psychologists in Louisiana, spearheading the landmark legislation for Louisiana psychologists in 2004. Act 251 repealed that legislation.

Needs Analysis

95% Want Information

Grassroots LA, LLC, an organization dedicated to revitalizing psychology across the state, is conducting a needs analysis. According to executive member and treasurer, Dr. Bryan Gros, data should help revitalize the community of psychology colleagues.

Dr. Gros said, “We felt that many psychologists in Louisiana have recently become re-energized. What we want to do is create a vehicle for this positive energy.” He continued, “We see the survey as a means for others not only to become more involved, but to voice some of their wants and needs. Also, we hope that this simple survey will spark others to join LPA and become more involved in the psychological community. I hope this is just one of many steps in a positive direction.”

The first of several samples was gathered from the Grassroots listserv, with a response rate of 29%. According to this preliminary sample, 95% of respondents want communications that keep them informed about what’s going on, and 75% are interested in legislative projects regarding the scope of practice of psychology. Seventy percent are interested in formal education opportunities for professional development, and 65% are interested in activities (media, programs, PSAs) to promote public awareness of the value of psychology.

Some responses that fell at about average included interest in networking activities, legislative projects concerning Act 251, and enjoyable and fun activities with colleagues. Low responses were to opportunities to mentor and help with business development.

The survey will be distributed to a larger sample this month via Dardard Media Services.
Candidates for Leadership Roles in LPA Give Views

The Times asked candidates to share their views by answering four questions. 1) What will be your goals? 2) What are you going to do to help us heal from the rifts from Act 251? 3) What are your main qualifications? And, 4) anything else? Four of the candidates responded to this request, two for President-Elect (Dr. VanGeffen and Dr. Griffin) and two for APA delegate (Dr. Nemeth and Dr. Gros). The Times appreciates their contributions below which is continued to the Special Section, page 16.

Phillip Griffin, for President-Elect

Goals as president of LPA:

I believe as much today as I did when I began my career that it is still very good to be a psychologist. Doom and gloom verbiage regarding our profession was just as prevalent thirty years ago as today. If being a psychologist were not a good thing, we would not be fighting constant battles to keep lesser trained persons from doing what we do. What we don't do very well is promote our profession. One of my goals is to initiate a far reaching statewide public relations campaign enlisting the help of a branch of our profession that has gone underutilized, the organizational/industrial psychologist. I feel certain that APA would provide support for such a campaign.

Nothing that has been done since I became an LPA member has altered the percentage of licensed psychologist who are LPA members. During our list-serve debate over the past few months someone said to me that the "membership issue" is an organizational/industrial psychology issue not a clinical psychology issue. I will make a concerted effort to increase membership and that will mean a change in philosophy.

I will do all I can to keep the newspaper that resurfaced under Dr. Levy's presidency flourishing. I will use the newspaper and every other means available to communicate with and be responsive to the membership.

Kim VanGeffen, for President-Elect

1. If I were elected LPA President Elect, my goals for my term as President Elect and then President would first be to capitalize on the positive momentum garnered by the LPA bylaws revisions, which I hope will be ratified at the convention. These changes will bring about better representation of the voices of LPA members to the leadership.

It also would be my goal to make LPA more diverse in terms of its membership and the issues it addresses. I also would seek to make LPA more transparent to its members, particularly with regard to important issues with which the association is dealing, such as our legislative agenda. Another goal would be to serve as a liaison between LPA and APA on national issues related to psychology and mental health. I also would like to see more regional organizations of psychologists, and I would like to be part of forming an association of psychologists in the Greater New Orleans area.

The Boulder Model in Action

by Carolyn Weyand

New Orleans area psychotherapists have an opportunity to watch movies and television, then learn, thanks to Mindy Kronenberg, PhD. Mindy has organized a discussion group through the New Orleans Birmingham Psychoanalytic Center (NOBPC) delving into HBO’s “In Treatment.” The In Treatment group will explore psychotherapy technique, ethical issues, and diagnostic questions raised by the television production with Mindy and co-leader, Dale Firestone, LCSW. She also directs the NOBPC’s film and discussion group allowing interested participants to watch a movie with psychological significance followed by discussion lead by a local psychoanalyst. All this in addition to her teaching, clinical and administrative responsibilities.

This young New Orleans psychologist epitomizes the Boulder Model. Mindy came to New Orleans from University of Memphis for her internship year at Louisiana State University Health Sciences Center (LSUHSC.) There she works with psychologist, Joy Osofsky, PhD, doing research and clinical work in infant mental health. Mindy joined the faculty at LSUHSC, Psychiatry Department, staying on to teach, pursue clinical research, and to treat at-risk children and infants. She speaks of her work with excitement, “I enjoy clinical work, but I want to do other things, too... Teaching... Administrative duties... Grant writing...” She does it all and loves it. In addition to academic work, Mindy brings her clinical, teaching and administrative skills to community mental health programs including the Early Trauma Treatment Network and Louisiana Rural Trauma Services Center, two programs funded by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Mindy is involved with the National Child Traumatic Stress Network (NCTSN.) Collegial networking is one of Mindy’s rewards. “I enjoy work where I can network with people who share my ideals and goals. NTCSN funds multiple sites that do child traumatic stress treatment. It is important to me because it funds a lot of people who do good clinical work. Boston, New York City, everywhere... There are people doing new things, cutting edge work.”

Mindy feels blessed with good luck in her professional development. Her story of getting accepted into University of Memphis and its influence on her research path exemplifies her good fortune. Mindy had set out to study and treat trauma survivors in graduate school, but her pre-envisioned path took a turn when Dr. Sarah Raz, who later became her mentor, contacted her, curious about her interests in psychology.

“We talked about her [Dr. Raz’s] research in infant neurodevelopment. It was a completely new area of study. I was fascinated by it.” Mindy’s curiosity led to her dissertation on the effects of placental pathology on infant cognitive development. In the course of her research, she administered more than 1000 Bayley Scales of Infant Development to children from four months to six years old. True to her thorough and curious nature, she studied placental pathology like a medical student, immersing herself in readings and hands on dissection of the placenta, “I just didn’t feel like I knew enough until I knew everything I could about placenta functioning.”

Mindy’s other interest, narrative in print and visual media, motivated her to take over the NOBPC film series after Katrina drove the original organizers away on evacuation. “I was sad not to have it. I wanted to come to it...” So, she resurrected the program that has become an annual series of monthly movie viewings and analyst-lead discussion. The quality of the program earns it accreditation by American Psychoanalytic Association for continuing education credit.

Mindy became an avid reader in childhood and continues as an adult. She reads fiction, history, autobiography and family sagas. She sees reading as a way to learn about oneself and others. The leap from printed narrative to the visual narrative of film and television was an easy one. In her words, “Narrative gives you the opportunity to experience another person’s reality... to learn about human psychological functioning, and to develop diagnostic skill. It [narrative] safely permits you to step outside of your comfort zone. I believe that’s important for psychologists.”

The film series she organizes each year arose from her desire to watch challenging films, films with provocative themes and content, like The Last King of Scotland and Equus with a group and have an opportunity to learn about psychopathology from material that can be so unsettling. “I find visual imagery more arousing than verbal imagery. In your mind, you can create worse images, but when you see it you are forced to face the reality. The group viewing experience and discussion helps in processing material that is disturbing to us.” Participants can expand their understanding from the discussion, particularly with the theoretical and clinical perspectives offered by the seasoned clinicians.

Dr. Robert Baker (3rd from L) is pictured above with his gold medal relay team, recently competing in the World Masters Association Indoor Championships in Kamloops, British Columbia. He told the Times that he was very happy with the gold medal, having set that as a personal life goal. He enjoyed seeing his friends from across the country, and also managed to finish fourth in the pentathlon and fifth in the pole vault, despite some serious problems with food poisoning the night before the competition.

Mindy arranges to facilitate the discussion.

With the same principles in mind, viewing provocative material and discussing for the sake of expanding professional understanding, Mindy developed the “In Treatment” discussion series for a fun learning experience for clinicians. The program includes viewings of the television series, readings on diagnosis, treatment technique and ethics, along with discussion. She co-leads the discussion with psychoanalyst, Dale Firestone, LCSW. For more information on these two fine programs, you can call Mindy Kronenberg at 504-343-5476.

Supernatural Selection: How Religion Evolved
by Matt J. Rossano, Ph.D.

June 2010
Oxford Press

Publisher:
“The roots of religion stretch as far back as half a million years, when our ancestors developed the motor control to engage in social rituals—that is, to sing and dance together. Then, about 70,000 years ago, a global ecological crisis drove humanity to the edge of extinction. It forced the survivors to create new strategies for survival, and religious rituals were foremost among them. Fundamentally, Rossano writes, religion is a way for humans to relate to each other and the world around them—and, in the grim struggles of prehistory, it offered significant survival and reproductive advantages. It emerged as our ancestors’ first health care system, and a critical part of that health care system was social support. Religious groups tended to be far more cohesive, which gave them a competitive advantage over non-religious groups, and enabled them to conquer the globe.”

In his new book, Supernatural Selection: How Religion Evolved, Dr. Matt Rossano provides an integrative view of the evolutionary history of religion, an approach filled with insights and stimulating logic. He shows how belief in the supernatural has served an adaptive purpose for humans—that it is religion that has made us human.

Analyzing both sides of a debate spurred by Richard Dawkins’ atheist manifesto, The God Delusion, Dr. Matt Rossano believes that this debate overlooks what science can tell us about religion.

Chair of the Psychology Department at Southeastern and an evolutionary psychologist, Matt said, “For Richard Dawkins and a few other notables, the world knows nothing quite so wicked as religion. We would all be far better off without it and all that trails in its wake: suicide bombers, Taliban-style tyranny, child-abusing clergy, science-denying creationists, etc.” Matt believes that Dawkins was missing or ignoring something very fundamental. “If religion was so clearly damaging to the human psyche and so corrosive of human society how could it have ever evolved?” And he wondered, “How is it possible that every culture throughout human history has had religion?”

Matt said, “Compounding the conundrum is the fact that time and again studies showed that religious people tended to be happier, healthier, more generous and civic minded than their non-religious counterparts. Religion is also tenacious,” he said. “Enlightenment thinkers promised that religion would fade as science and reason provided a more accurate picture of the natural world. To the bewilderment of Dawkins and his ilk, the world seems to have reneged on that Enlightenment promise.”

Matt has studied the evolution of religion and other uniquely human cognitive traits for some time. He is the author of Evolutionary Psychology: The Science of Human Behavior and Evolution. His book chapter “The Archaeology of Consciousness,” in Cognitive Archaeology and Human Evolution, and other numerous papers, address evolution, ritual, religion, and moral behavior. “Making friends, making tools, and making symbols,” is coming out soon in a special issue of Current Anthropology, focusing on working memory and human evolution.

Con’t pg 9
“It was not until I ran across an essay by William James,” Matt said, “that the central theme of the book began to take shape.” In The Will to Believe, James contended that relational trust provided a rational basis for religious faith. If we want friends, James argued, we have to be willing to trust them. “Demanding up-front evidence of someone’s trustworthiness risked insulting them,” Matt explained, “thereby killing the friendship before it ever got started. Relationships require a bit of irrational risk-taking. For James, the risk was worth it since the rewards of personal relationships far outweighed the intellectual compromise required to set things in motion.” James then extended this logic to religion.

“Other evidence seemed to confirm that at its core, religion was not about doctrines, creeds, institutions, or even miracles, but about relationships,” Matt said. In Supernatural Selection, he reviews important work by psychologist Lee Kirkpatrick, who has shown that attachment theory provides a profitable theoretical framework for understanding religion. “A secure attachment to God can provide the same physical and psychological benefits as secure attachments to other humans,” he noted. Additionally, anthropologist Roger Lohmann’s fieldwork found that religious conversion was better understood as the adoption of a new set of relationships rather than a new set of doctrines or beliefs.

Prominent Darwinian philosopher Dr. Michael Ruse (Florida State University) heartily endorses Rossano’s approach to the subject: “Supernatural Selection is a fascinating account of how religion arose in response to our human adaptive needs”, says Ruse, “…[it] will be at the forefront of all future discussion on this topic.”

Matt said, “I hope the book gives people a different perspective on religion. Just as human relationships can be either good or bad, so to with religious relationships. Just as human relationships almost necessarily involve a degree of irrationality, so to with religious relationships.”

“Really, the focus in both cases ought to be more on the outcomes of the relationship. Is it good or bad for the person and those around them?”

Dr. Rick Adams
Bluegrass Musician, Singer-Songwriter

For Dr. Rick Adams, licensed clinical psychologist who practices full-time in Pineville, “Music is still just a hobby, albeit a busy one.” Dr. Adams is the guitarist and lead vocalist in the bluegrass duo named “Tuning South.”

Dr. Adams’ professional activity these days primarily consists of consultation and assessment. He continues with his career-long emphasis in work with children/adolescents who have developmental, behavioral, or learning problems. He also assists with treatment and placement determinations for the Office of Juvenile Justice in the central Louisiana area. His associate in the Pineville office is Dr. John Simoneaux, a forensic psychologist who also is a serious music lover.

“I’ve been in full-time private practice for about 25 years and still going strong,” Rick said. And his music has helped him maintain a healthy balance.

“Music is a great stress reducer for me—helped a lot when I was feeling some burnout about five years ago.” It was then that Rick found out that he still enjoyed his work, when he wasn’t “working 24-7.”

The other member of Tuning South is Mark Normand, who sings harmony vocals, and plays mandolin and fiddle. Sometimes the duo will add a third member on bass fiddle for certain performances or venues.

Rick met Mark Normand on the “jam scene” and both discovered that they had matching interests in music, artists and genres. They teamed up to take advantage of this symmetry, and decided to “take it on the road…” performing traditional bluegrass, “brother duet type harmonies,” “roots music,” and original tunes composed by Rick.

Tuning South has recently performed at Acadian Village and the Blue Dog Café in Lafayette, NuNu’s in Armandville, the Joe Dreyfus Restaurant in Livonia, and at Cottonport Wildcat Mega-Reunion in Cottonport.

Rick’s interests also extend to songwriting, and he has composed several original works. “I’ve long been an amateur songwriter,” he explained. Two of his compositions are: "Blue Just Looks Black in the Dark" and "Some Winds Are Lonesome".

Rick told the Times, “‘Blue Just Looks Black’ was written during Hurricane Gustav when all the electricity was out. Although the song is about romance gone wrong, it was actually inspired by the fact that I was having trouble getting dressed by candlelight—difficulty with sock identification. Hence, ‘Blue Just Looks Black in the Dark.’ That song seems to be the number one request at the jams I frequent in the Lafayette area.”

Tuning South is slated to perform at the “Pro Psych Party,” during the upcoming LPA Convention following the business meeting on Thursday, April 22nd.

"I'm looking forward to playing at the convention," Rick said. "It will be a little strange to have my worlds collide like that. I usually keep my music alter ego separate from that 'professional psychologist guy.' It should be interesting."

their identity, whether it is cultural, ethnic, or in the case of the psychology community, the various sub-disciplines.

"You come from some place," she said. "You have a heritage, you do things for a reason. We can come up with our solutions to our conflicts, when we preserve our diversity. So, a different way to think about diversity is to preserve who we are, as an ethnic group, as an individual, or, in this case, as a discipline."

Marva does this in her training and consulting work, called Cultural Competency Workshops, where she uses her model to help individuals and groups. "When we celebrate and preserve our identity, we are in a much better position to create something new with somebody who's different than we are," she said. "We are better able to address those really hard issues when we preserve who we are."

"The other piece with reclaiming who you are, from the model that I've developed, has to do with understanding your emotional response to diversity. That's where we get into trouble." Marva pointed out, "In the emotional response, you forget who you are. If you reclaim your identity, and are aware of the emotional response, then you can manage the emotions."

Marva has developed a self-report measure used in her workshops, for participate insight and goal setting.

"People want to know where they stand in relation to other people," she explained. The measure includes racial openness, openness to diversity ethic identity, and emotional response to diversity.

Cultural competence for work with diverse populations is an "on-going process," she said. "Not something that is resolved in a one or two hour workshop. Diversity is way, way bigger." And, "The best place to start with is self."

Dr. John Robinson came to Louisiana in 1982, from his position on the psychiatry faculty of Harvard Medical School. In New Orleans he was one of the administrators who opened the New Orleans Adolescent Hospital. From there he went to the Office of the Dean and psychiatry and pediatrics faculty at LSU Medical Center in New Orleans. Later he moved back to Washington DC, but remains licensed in Louisiana. He is currently professor of psychiatry and surgery at Howard University, College of Medicine, and clinical professor of psychiatry at Georgetown University School of Medicine. He is also president of the American Board of Clinical Health Psychology (ABPP) and Vice Chair of the Psychology Board in D.C. He is author of Diversity in Human Interactions, The Tapestry of America.

“What we do naturally is try to stratify people,” Dr. Robinson said. “Based on gender, based on race, profession, even within a profession—we try to build some type of hierarchy.”

“That’s a human characteristic,” he said. “We want someone under us. We always try to do that. A majority population does not always refer to numbers; it’s power. What you see in psychology is that we started off with the clinical psychologist vs. everybody else. If you were not a clinician, you really were not a psychologist. Then we embellished that by getting licensed.”

“Now it seems to be that break between those with prescription privileges and those without. Are you ‘better’ because you have a quasi-medical license? Because in our heads, medicine is superior to psychology.”

“It’s that kind of hierarchical thing,” he continued. John works in a medical setting, and sees the similar dynamic. “So in psychology we’re doing the same thing. We’ve done that all along. Now we’re developing that extra hierarchy by adding medical psychologists. So for the practice people it’s going to be the licensed psychologists left behind because the attention is on the medical psychologists, because they also have support of the medical board. But we also have to understand they’re still subservient.”

“So you’re an independent practitioner but you can’t practice independently. We fought hard to be independent practitioners, to be autonomous. And to get that extra piece of status, we gave away our independence and our autonomy.”

When asked what might help, John said, “We have to realize that all of us are psychologists, and we’re all there trying to do a job. And not try to find differences with each other, because when we find differences, we tend to have some sort of hierarchy in mind.”

He pointed to a common mistake in thinking, saying, “When we look at diversity, regardless of what areas we are talking about, we think of it as a blending, as a melting.” But, he said, “That’s not diversity. Diversity is like a salad. Different components put together to make something else. You can distinguish each part. It is not a stew.”

“We need to enjoy the diversity,” he continued. “Like my book says, in a tapestry you can see all the different threads and themes and colors. It’s not all blended in and dyed in as one. And the diversity is the thing that keeps the fabric intact: it keeps it vibrant, it keeps it renewed, and it keeps it interesting.”

Dr. Linda Brannon, Professor of Psychology at McNeese State University, is author of textbooks in introductory, gender, and health psychology. Her writing and teaching leaves little time for research, but when it did, her topics revolved around social cognition and attribution. Her work in gender (Gender: Psychological Perspectives, 5th edition, Allyn & Bacon) brought her to the wider issues of diversity.

When asked about the issues within psychology she said, “I thought of the classic social psychology research on group formation and polarization. When people think about the groups to which they belong, and those to which they do not, thinking tends to fall into in-groups and out-groups and forms the basis for prejudice and discrimination,” she said.

“This is classic social psychology, which psychologists began researching 60 years ago. Louisiana psychologists have formed in-groups and out-groups and are behaving exactly the way that the social psychology research discovered.”

“It’s too bad that we’ve become caught up in things we discovered,” she said. “And additionally too bad that we don’t recognize it.”

Media Matters
by Dr. Susan Dardard

Last month I discussed our urgent need to market ourselves, to remedy widespread ignorance and confusion about psychology, and to distinguish ourselves from others, by reaching across the state through the media.

This month I give you my first concrete suggestion about how we can distribute vital information about our profession to the public. I recommend that we invest in public service announcements, more commonly identified as PSAs.

A well-produced PSA can become the reliable delivery vehicle that we use to carry messages through various print, broadcast, and internet avenues, to connect successfully with the community.

The best PSA campaigns have optimal “frequency and reach,” communicating with enough of the people enough of the time to positively impact attitudes and behaviors. The goal is to guide the maximum number of individuals toward healthy choices through repetition, repetition, repetition.

The problem with most PSAs is the lack of control over when and how often they appear. A brilliant creation easily gets relegated to appearing once a month in the middle of the night, hardly the way to influence anyone about anything.

One way around that dilemma is to develop a relationship with an ongoing show that will take up your cause and include your PSA as part of their program. I would like to be that show for psychology. I have been that show in the past, and am working on a new show for the future. I will tell you more about how we might work together as I get closer to the launch date of my new production.

Meanwhile, please consider what topics you know the most about and have the most passion about that you think can best showcase how psychology can help the citizens of our state. Please email your suggestions to me at mediaservices@drsusandardard.com. I am eager to hear from you!

2. I think that I would be able to help heal the rifts that LPA caused in the association because, while I never have been personally interested in obtaining prescription privileges, I never opposed other psychologists who were. I truly respect the hard work and dedication required by psychologists who are involved in obtaining prescription privileges in Louisiana. That said, I would try to promote the perception that LPA is an organization that serves the needs of all of its members. I believe that the Bylaws revisions also will help to heal this rift.

3. I believe that I am qualified to serve as LPA President Elect and President because I have served in these roles in the past. I was LPA President in 2000 so I know what the job entails. I also have served as a leader in other organizations. I was on the Bylaws Revision Committee, so I am fully aware of the new regulations under which our association may operate if the changes are ratified. I am an optimistic person and I believe that I am good at getting people motivated and working together. I have found that I am skilled at conflict resolution and helping people to work toward compromise, something I often am called on to do in working with patients in my practice. I am a good listener and willing to accept input from others when making decisions. I also know that I am good at public speaking, and can represent our organization well with others. In spite of these qualifications and talents, I really don’t take myself too seriously!

4. I am a devotee of Martha Stewart. If elected, I could bring home-made cookies to the Board meetings, as I did when I was president in 2000!

Kim E. VanGeffen, Ph.D.

Phillip Griffin, for President-Elect

Concerning the Medical Psychologists and Act 251, I will do all I can to demonstrate that being a member of LPA is important to all psychologists. Many of us, including my opponent in this election, Dr. VanGeffen, have put in many hours on proposed bylaws changes that will increase the membership involvement and representation on the executive committee (EC). The recommended changes are designed to create more transparency. If elected, my EC will approve any and all legislative initiatives with the understanding that some details are handled on the fly by the appointed legislative chair.

Medical Psychology is an option for all psychologists in Louisiana and in the opinion of some very astute and talented psychologists that position was made stronger by Act 251. It is time to move on to other issues. Many sates are attempting to eliminate the year of supervision for newly graduated PhDs which is an onerous burden for the newly graduated trying to gain employment. This is a legislative issue we need to assess. I have proposed that we address the issue in the legislature of psychologists becoming coroner’s officers. If elected, these are two of many issues I would bring forward for debate.

Qualifications:
Dr. Van Geffen and I share the qualification of experience within LPA. In this time of change, especially on the EC if the bylaws changes are approved, such experience will be valuable.
I have retained, even during this period of debate, a very good relationship with the community of psychologists in this state. As president-elect serving on the EC and as president I will remain determined to keep all of us together.

I would first like to thank you for the opportunity to express my thoughts about what I would do as the Louisiana Psychological Association’s council representative to the American Psychological Association. Being a modest person, I think it would be unfair to respond to the question of what "my goals" would be as council delegate. Rather, I believe the position would best be served in keeping with the goals of LPA’s membership and executive committee. Thus, if elected, my priority would be to ethically and honestly represent and advocate the needs and voices of LPA at a local and national level.

In order to do so, I think it would be critical for me to cultivate an open and honest dialogue with the entire LPA membership on key issues such as national legislation, policies and procedures, education, governance, etc. I also believe it would be equally important for our members to be fully aware of various agendas and projects that I (LPA) would bring with me to APA, as well as those with which I would return—whatever they may be. In sum, this position is less about me as a candidate and more about LPA, its entire membership, and the state of psychology and mental health in Louisiana.

Wonderful questions and great timing. It would be naïve of me to believe that Act 251 or at least the process surrounding it has not caused

Darlyne Nemeth,
for APA Delegate

Thank you for the opportunity to outline my background and qualifications for the position of APA Executive Council Representative. I now offer the following information for your readership’s consideration:

1. The primary responsibility of Louisiana’s Delegate to the American Psychological Association’s (APA) Executive Council is to represent the best interest of Louisiana Psychologists, specifically to represent the membership of the Louisiana Psychological Association (LPA). Representing the best interests of all Louisiana psychologists is, however, also important.

In order to do this effectively, besides attending APA’s Executive Council meetings, our APA delegate must attend all regularly scheduled meetings of LPA’s Executive Council and must be available/accountable to our membership. Personal professional interests must be set aside. The will of the majority must prevail. The concerns of those who do not adhere to LPA’s majority positions must also be acknowledged and addressed. Our APA Council Representative must first and foremost, however, represent LPA.

2. LPA members need to come together as a group to be heard and to heal. Those who were wounded by the Act 251 process need to express their concerns and have their feelings validated. Some of this directly or indirectly occurred during the Bylaws Revision Meetings. But, more direct efforts disagreements, some of which have been passionate. I see this as a good thing, as passion often leads to resolutions and results. From someone who has watched closely from the sidelines in the past and more recently been very active, I see more positive energy now in LPA than I can ever recall. I would advocate for this to continue. While this will sound rather simplistic, it's okay to disagree and to do it passionately. Silence is akin to denial - it solves very little in terms of relationships. With that being said, as council representative and an executive committee member of LPA, I can say with certainty that I would speak for the membership when given the opportunity, even when this involves ideas and voices that conflict. As stated earlier, cultivation of open and honest dialogue would be a high priority. I am free from hidden agendas. In fact and as alluded to before, if elected, I would represent, the membership of LPA with my voice being only one of many.

Although by years, I am a mid-career psychologist, I still consider myself young and passionate, with much more to learn. First, I view myself as an advocate, especially for those I represent. I currently am President of the Board of Directors of the Mental Health America of Louisiana, and an active one at that. One duty is to oversee and monitor liaisons to our national organization, Mental Health America. This fits quite well with the position of council representative. Mental Health America of Louisiana has been dedicated to promoting mental health wellness, preventing mental and substance use conditions, and overcoming mental illnesses and addictions through advocacy, education, research and service. I have also worked in state government for the last 15 years. At Capital Area Human Services District, a District of the Department of Health and Hospitals, I serve as the Director of the Department of Psychology. Working mostly with an underprivileged population at CAHSD, I have the pleasure of advocating as well. At CAHSD, I have also been able to serve on and chair numerous committees creating are needed. For many, this was a very traumatic experience. We will soon be approaching the one year anniversary of the passage of Act 251. During LPA's forthcoming convention, I am presenting an all day workshop on anniversary reactions. The focus will be on the Anniversary Wellness Workshop I presented in Louisiana one year post Hurricanes Katrina and Rita and in China one year post Sichuan Earthquake. Both were experiential learning workshops designed to train/help others to deal with the traumas they experienced.

Traumas come in many forms, some via natural disasters and some via human-induced disasters. Resiliency is the key to recovery. In the afternoon section of the workshop, the techniques that helped so many heal from environmental trauma can be used to help us. Whether via Katrina, China, or Act 251, anniversary reactions must be addressed so that we can move forward. Remember, traumas that happen to a group must be healed within a group. Join us on Saturday, April 24, 2010, to continue the healing journey.

various policies, procedures and by-laws. I also am adjunct instructor at LSU, where I have taught for the last 12 years, which adds much welcomed variety for me.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak about myself. Call me optimistic, but in my experience, I have found that when representing others, working from the heart, with their best interests (not mine) in mind, yields nothing but positive results, which has been quite rewarding, both personally and professionally. I hope to continue serving in this way.

Psychological Association (LPA), where I have held every office except for Treasurer. (Anyone who knows me well understands that being Treasurer would not have been a good idea.) I recognized, early on, the need for LPA to develop a strong political arm. Therefore, I founded the Century Club. I also served several terms as Legislative and Social Issues Chair, rewrote the LPA Bylaws many years ago, and most recently, served on the LPA Bylaws Revision Committee. I have remained active in LPA throughout the last 35 years. As President, I was fortunate to be included in the APA Leadership Training Conferences where I learned to lobby members of Congress. I also hired Bud Mapes and Associates to represent LPA in the Louisiana Legislature and worked with subsequent lobbyists to pursue and protect the best interests of psychology. Being involved with the legislature was, and continues to be, an amazing process.

At the national level, I served for six years as American Psychological Association (APA) Division 40’s Archivist and set up the Division 40 Archives at the Louisiana State University (LSU) Hill Memorial Library. Clinical Neuropsychology is the only APA Division to house its archives outside of the University of Akron. For my efforts, my colleagues, Drs. Linas Bielauskas, Ken Adams, and Stanley Berent, asked me to place my name in Nomination for Fellow. When chosen, I became one of only nine women Division 40 fellows. Being in the company of Drs. Muriel Lezak, Eileen Fennell and Edith Kaplan was very humbling. My involvement in the International Neuropsychological Society (INS) has been an amazing journey as well. In 1986, I served as the local arrangements chair for the international meeting in New Orleans. This lead to years of presentations at INS, National Academy of Neuropsychology (NAN), APA, and the World Council Psychotherapy (WCP)...a tradition I continue to this day.

In some ways, APA’s Executive Council may be likened to Louisiana’s legislature. The best qualifications I can bring to the table are my many Legislative experiences while serving LPA and the Louisiana State Board of Examiners of Psychologists (LSBEP), interacting with various Louisiana governors in an attempt to represent the best interests of our profession, and serving as an LSPEB delegate to the American Association of State and Provincial Licensing Boards (AASPB). The latter represents a close parallel to APA’s Executive Council. Also, while serving for six years on APA Division 40’s (Clinical Neuropsychology) Executive Committee, I learned a great deal about the inner workings of APA’s Executive Council.

At the international level, as Vice President of the United States Chapter of the World Council for Psychotherapy (WCP), I am one of two US WCP delegates to the United Nations. The other delegate is Dr. Judy Kuriansky from New York City. WCP, as a Non-Governmental Organization (NGO), has many opportunities to remind this international body of the importance of addressing human suffering on all levels. This has been a wonderful opportunity for me to understand and respect cultural diversity, political differences, and to overcome existing barriers. Being psychologically astute and open to new ideas has served me well. Thus, I bring this wealth of experience to my candidacy for the position of LPA’s representative to APA’s Executive Council.

4. I bring to the table 35 years of service to our profession. During that time I have served LPA and LSBEP to the best of my ability. I have mentored many along the way. I have been involved in the science and practice of our profession.

I have served my community – locally, nationally, and internationally. And I have good social and political skills. Hopefully, these experiences and traits will allow me to continue to serve LPA and psychology well.
